Improvement of chemical methods. Need lower detection limits. Wider range of compounds needs to be analyzed ( including hormones ). Get current methods reviewed and approved; make methods available to broader scientific community. 2. Improvement of biological methods. Methods to identify specific pathogens, bacteria, viruses. 3. Immunoassay methods. Potentially useful for field-screening to define where to focus more intensive study. 4. Quantifying exposure and the ecological effects from this exposure. Begin analyzing only for compounds that have demonstrable effects. 5. Establish consistent national-scale monitoring methods ( sampling, analysis ) for emerg-ing compounds, pathogens, and microbes. Train technical staff in these methods. 6. Establish biological infrastructure for long-term monitoring using consistent protocols. 7. Research on source transport fate for emerging compounds. 8. Obtain basic chemical data on emerging compounds ( for example, kinetics ). This infor-mation may be available from chemical producers. Communication 1. Present results to emphasize compounds of most concern, rather than a long alphabeti-cal listing. 2. Keep abreast of current agricultural practices ( for example, CAFOs, cultivation meth-ods, GMOs, and effects related to them ). 3. Improve communication with both the regulated community and the regulating com-munity. The regulated community may have much useful data on their products. Also, improve communication with the general public. 4. Information transfer at the local level through such activities as open houses at science centers, local conferences, and participation in conferences organized by various agri-culture water biology groups. 5.
