Checking this amount by the usual formulae we get: $d = 5.2$ (as these bars will be placed on top of the cross bars) $a = 0.14$, and $b = 12$. Hence This shows that with the above arrangement both the steel and concrete will be well understressed. The full thickness of the slab, including the bottom cover, will be 6 inches. Sides of Tank.--If the length of a side is less than 1 time its height, and the angles are securely tied together, the greatest tendency to burst will be in a vertical direction, and horizontal reinforcement will be required similar to the walls of Examples XIII. and XIV. The vertical distribution rods if placed about 12 inches apart will be sufficient to take the stress in the opposite direction. When the length exceeds 1J time the height, the support from the return walls can be neglected, and each side considered in the same way as the wall of Example XII., the reinforcement being vertical with horizontal distribution rods about 12 inches apart. In either case the angles must be well tied together, and the sides well tied to the bottom. The latter method will be thb one for the present example.
