Not illustrated. 1873 Excerpt: .in cleverly slinging; And for some little way they so bore him along, Altho they neath his weight sorely trembled, In despite of the jeers of the curious throng Which had suddenly round them assembled. Out of this plan, however, but fresh trouble sprung, For, just as they were o er a bridge going, The Ass, who had no fancy for being so slung, Began so much inquietude showing, That they stopp d to unfetter his feet, but before They could him from his bonds quite deliver, He asunder the tackling so suddenly tore, That he fell and was drown d in the river. Well, my Boy, said the poor Man, as home they now went, The we will not with any one quarrel, We, methinks, may deduce from this hapless event The most useful and excellent moral: That, since do what one will one can never please all, Nor, it seemeth, escape some derision, As a rule, he s least apt into error to fall Who acts oftenest on his own decision. THE FOX AND THE WOODMAN S once a Fox, by hounds hard prest, O er hill and valley tore, He felt himself so much distrest, That he for a few moments rest Had ne er so sigh d before. At last, tho not till nearly dead, He reach d a Woodman s hut, And was in seeming pity led, At his entreaty, to a shed, And therein safely shut. A minute more, and...
